Ultrasound Needle Guides: Quicker & More Accurate Ultrasound Guidance

General Purpose Needle Guides are tools designed to provide more precision during ultrasound-guided interventions. They improve needle visualization and patient safety. They also reduce procedure time and patient discomfort.

5 times +

punctures 5 times more successful at the first attempt [1]

Average time to perform a biopsy

68% shorter

when using a needle guide

3 times +

needle 3 times more visible [2]

- Constant tracking of the tip of the needle throughout the procedure, reducing unwanted damage to surrounding structures

- Facilitate navigation of the needle towards hard-to-reach areas

- The guide keeps the needle in place, allowing the clinician to focus on the procedure

- Keeps the needle in the ultrasound plane

- Needle follows the path shown on your ultrasound display

With our needle guides, practitioners have the ability to make their vascular access procedures more efficient and less traumatic for patients. Improving patient safety and comfort is at the core of their design. Using a guide facilitates a safer short-axis approach. It will allow practitioners to choose the adequate depth and hold the needle in place during the procedure. Additionally, clinicians inserting catheters can optimize the insertion angle with the guide. Needle guides reduce the number of attempts to reach a target. They also minimize the risk of posterior wall punctures. Moreover, our needle guides have been designed with a quick release feature for the 2-Axis technique. Practitioners will also find them to be particularly useful when dealing with patients whose veins may be harder to reach, such as pediatric or overweight patients. Overall, utilizing needle guides for vascular access procedures facilitates improved workflow, lower procedure time, and increased patient comfort.

Protecting the eye area from radiation exposure is of the utmost importance. Even low doses of radiation can cause irreversible damage to the lens, which leads to cataracts and vision loss. In cases of higher doses, clinicians could experience damage to the conjunctiva, sclera, iris, and the retina's blood vessels. The possible damage is even more pronounced for clinicians who regularly face exposure to x-rays. Not only are these individuals at risk for early cataracts and retinal damage, but they also face a significant risk of cancer.

Practitioners may also increase their chances of developing glaucoma and inflict damage to their tear ducts. As a result, medical staff working in interventional radiology and other clinical areas where x-ray exposure is frequent must adequately protect their eyes with lead glasses. Studies have found that the use of glasses is able to reduce the lens dose rate by a factor of five to ten. Our selection of glasses attenuate the radiation passing through the lenses, thereby blocking many of the harmful rays and minimizing the risk of damage to the eye area.
